Port Authority Reviews Freight Challenges

AREA - Freight movements around the New York-New Jersey region are expected to rise by 70 percent in the next 20 years. The Port Authority of New York and New Jersey met last week with transportation leaders to develop how to move billions of dollars in freight - including food, furniture, clothing and other household items - throughout an already congested bi-state region. Ninety-five percent of goods are now moved by truck, resulting in congestion on bridges and highways, and in air quality issues, according to the Port Authority.

The Port Authority will begin an Environmental Impact Statement (EIS) for the Cross Harbor Freight Movement Project, which was initially identified as a major regional issue 15 years ago. Three goals of the EIS, scheduled for the end of 2010, are: to increase the region's economic competitiveness, decrease traffic congestion and reduce pollution and greenhouse gas emissions.

The Port Authority announced the acquisition and planned rehabilitation of the Jersey City-based New York New Jersey Rail Corporation, which operates a rail float barge facility that transports cargo-filled rail cars between the two states. As part of the purchase, the agency assumed the existing lease for approximately 27 acres of land at Greenville Yard in Jersey City in connection with the rail float barge operation. The total acquisition cost is estimated at $16 million.

The rail freight barge allows rail cars to be put directly on a barge and floated across the harbor, docking at terminals at either 51st or 65th streets in Bay Ridge, Brooklyn, where connections are made with businesses either locally in Brooklyn or further east on Long Island. Rail cars also are transported back across the harbor to connect to the national rail freight network via the Greenville Yard in Jersey City. Currently, a majority of the cargo transported between the two states is moved by truck.

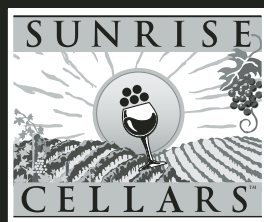

The only other rail link across the Hudson River is operated by CSX and located 100 miles to the north near Albany. This circuitous routing adds over 200 miles for rail freight goods traveling to and from the south and west. This rehabilitated rail float operation will provide a convenient short cut.

In June 2007, the Port Authority and the City of New York improved bistate freight movement when the $75-million Staten Island Rail Link was completed. Last week, the city and the Port Authority announced that 45,000 containers were moved by rail during the first year of operation, removing nearly 100,000 trucks from local bridges and highways, according to the PA.

The Port Authority also is expanding rail capacity at its port terminals in New Jersey, which have handled nearly three million cargo containers and removed more than five million trucks from the road since 1991.
